

SARMs in Dietary Supplements and Other Products

Selective androgen receptor modulators, or SARMs, are synthetic drugs designed to mimic the effects of testosterone. Although these drugs are still in the research and testing stages of development, and they are classified as drugs, yet most are readily available online both as ingredients in dietary supplement products and as chemicals available for “research only.” Some websites marketing SARMs for “research use” include descriptions with language clearly targeting use for bodybuilding. However, according to FDA “Body-building products that contain selective androgen receptor modulators, or SARMs, have not been approved by the FDA and are associated with serious safety concerns, including potential to increase the risk of heart attack or stroke and life threatening reactions like liver damage.” They’re also prohibited for use in sport. For example, a 2017 FDA Safety Alert describes andarine and ostarine as “unapproved drugs and anabolic steroid-like substances.” In addition, some experimental drugs that are not SARMs are being marketed as or along with SARMs, but they are equally illegal in dietary supplements and prohibited for sport. As a result, the most common of these are also included on the next page. In addition, there are dietary supplements marketed as SARMs that do not contain any of the drugs listed here. The following list will help you recognize these drugs, which often go by various names, as well as currently available products that contain them.

* Note: In 2013, the original developer discontinued GW501516 due to the discovery of severe toxic effects, and the World Anti-Doping Authority (WADA) issued an alert strongly warning against its use. Nevertheless, it is still widely available online.

The list below includes both dietary supplement products and “research” products currently available. The latter do not have the labeling required for dietary supplements. “Current” refers to anything that could be purchased online as of the date on this list, including some products that have apparently been discontinued by their manufacturer or distributor but that can still be obtained from other sources online. The list is a far-from-complete representation of “research” suppliers, as there are too many to include them all; some may legitimately sell only to research facilities.
